

Studies have shown that educated and engaged healthcare consumers are healthier and consume less healthcare than engaged and educated consumers. Activating people to be more engaged in their health and providing them the resources to do so creates a healthier population, decreasing health care spending. These are the real keys to sustainable healthcare, focusing on health to decrease spending rather than cost shifting.